Jade, this reminds me of our discussion in class about trying to put toothpaste back in the tube...it cannot happen. Unfortunately, this is something that workplaces are having to deal with on a daily basis, not just in schools.

In the video, boys from a school decided to make a list of girls at the school and rate them, whether it was good or bad. The list ended up getting sent out to everyone in the school and it hurt the girls' feelings and made them cry. One of the boys did not know his sister's name was on it until he came home and saw her crying from what they had said about her on the list. He stated that he never would have said anything of those mean things to anyone's face and now he cannot take it back but he wishes he could. This topic of cyberbullying is important in the workplace because a coworker, employer, or anyone could do something to you and you want to say something about them online and it could end up getting back to them. As a result, you could end up fired, suspended from work, or really hurt someone's feelings. Once you say something online or even in person you cannot take it back and it does its damage before you can do anything about it.
